the things which will happen in Russia will make all workers feel that there is a contradiction between democracy and the mission of the proletariat. The Spread of Christianity in the Modern World. By EDWARD CALDWELL MOORE. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1919. Pp. xi+352.

In this volume Dr. Moore convinces us that the enterprise of modern missions really makes an important chapter in the study of history and of sociology. Perhaps no book has succeeded better in relating the missionary movement to the background of general history. The author has been for nineteen years professor at Harvard and for seven years president of the American Board of Foreign Missions, so that we are not surprised to find in his work both the adequate grasp of administrative detail of missions and the scholarly handling of historical material. The book is exceedingly compact and comprehensive but serves well as a textbook in missions, outlining the work of all churches and in all lands, and briefly evaluating the life-work of the chief contributors to missionary progress. A remarkably full list of references to sources and collateral readings is appended, classified in accordance with his chapter headings. This list covers twenty-four pages and greatly enhances the value of the textbook. It is refreshing to find in the book no trace of the enthusiast or the propagandist to interfere with the unbiased interpretation of history.
